IS PLAYING IN BAND AND ORCHESTRA SAFE?

The risk that your instrument will make you sick is very low. Practicing good hand hygiene, never sharing instruments and regular cleaning, especially if you are sick, can make your instrument as safe as other household items. Playing wind instruments around others requires extra care however, because research studies have shown those instruments produce more aerosols and droplets than speaking and breathing. Fortunately, those same research studies demonstrate that simple mitigation efforts including using performer face masks and instrument bell covers can reduce the transmission of aerosols produced by wind instruments to near background levels. Most schools are now adopting those strategies and more to help ensure the safe return of music making in the classroom.
